

Who am I and why are you so different?

Illya Nuzbrokh

I'm Illya Nuzbrokh. I'm 13. I'm a boy. I'm from Kiev, which is the capital of Ukraine. I study in England.

I can write much information about myself and nobody is the same as I am; even more, nobody is the same as anyone else. All the people on the Earth are different from each other. Everyone on the Earth is an individual. What exactly makes us individuals? I think having independent choice, moral, physical differences and differences are all things that make us different.

Having independent choice means that it depends only on us what we will choose. Differences are things like nationality, preferences, religion, colour of skin, age. Sometimes people hate, give offence and sometimes even kill other people because of their differences such as nationality, religion, and even preferring another football team.

There are many reasons for such behaviour, but the most common is when people have complexes; they want to seem higher so they make other people seem lower because it's harder to grow than to lower others. Or they are religious fanatics; fanaticism makes people blind.

And so the problem today is that we try to find differences between ourselves; yes we are individuals, but we have to find some common things: things that will bind us together.

For the end we all are human beings.
